Bonus Tips

1. Use Automation When Appropriate:

If you find yourself sending the same messages over and over, you can likely use automation to save time and increase efficiency. For example, appointment-related texts and review requests are great to put on autopilot.

2. Keep It Short And Sweet:

It's best practice to keep your texts under 160 characters. 1) Your patients usually aren't interested in reading a novel-length paragraph text and 2) Long texts can sometimes cost more to send. When in doubt, keep it short and sweet!

3. Only Send Texts During Business Hours:

Unless there are unique exceptions, it's typically best practice to only send text messages during your business hours. Not only is it respectful to your patients, but it's actually against some texting compliance laws to send texts outside of normal hours.

Bonus Tips (continued)

4. Be Mindful Of Your Texting Frequency:

The goal of business texting is to be helpful and provide value to patients. If you send too many texts too often, it can come across as spam and your patients will opt-out. Use your best judgment when sending texts and keep an eye out for high opt-out rates.

5. Experiment With Your Messaging:

The best way to get the most out of your texts is to experiment and discover which messaging works best. Don't be afraid to A/B test your messages to find out which ones result in the best patient engagement.

6. Be Human:

Automated texts have their time and place, but sending a personalized text is an extra touch that lets your patients know you care and builds a stronger relationship. Remember to have fun, be creative, and be human in your texts.
